WHERE LONDON SLEEPS.
More People Lodge Below Ground Than on the Fourth Floor.

London Mail.
There are over 150 square miles of street in London. Each square mile has an average of 120 streets, and each street has an average of about 100 houses. There are, therefore, over 1,500,000 houses in London.

Of these houses about half are hotels, apartments, chambers, lodgings, or tenement-houses. A quarter is shops, and a similar number is offices, flats and private houses.

It is interesting to discover where these people sleep, and in order to do so it is necessary to divide the population of London into five classes. These are: the basement, or underground, sleepers; first-floor, second-floor, third-floor and fourth-floor sleepers.

The dwellers in private houses sleep mostly upon the second, third and fourth floors. Hardly any except, perhaps, one or two of the builders in the larger houses—sleep in the basement.

Taking the shops and offices, we find that the first and second floors are almost invariably given over to business. In some cases nobody lives on the premises at night, but in others the third and fourth floors may be let as chambers or flats, or maintained as sleeping apartments for the assistants. In the smaller shops the proprietor and his family not infrequently reside in the upper portions of his business premises, and in very large warehouses and shops a housekeeper and his wife may generally be found to utilize the basement of the house for their own habitation.

In the hotel and lodging-house division we find that the rooms on all the floors of the house are in the greater number of cases used as sleeping apartments with the utmost impartiality. This does not, however, apply to the fourth floor, to which very few of the houses in this class except the hotels are able to aspire. Although it may sound incredible, it will be found that many more people live in the basement—that is to say, underground—in London than on the fourth floor; but the figures stand higher in the accompanying table because the division of fourth floor includes all others of a greater altitude.

Tabulated, this is now the figure for the 1,600,000 houses in London:

Underground	400,000
First floor	400,000
Second floor	400,000
Third floor	400,000
Fourth floor and over	400,000
Total	1,600,000

In obtaining the number of persons the average being about four growing persons to a house—we get the startling figures of 64,000, or nearly 30,000 underground sleepers. What we find is that the condition is under atmospheric conditions such as we have recently had thrust upon us?

The latest census taken at Cynthiana shows a population of 3,377.
